Thyroglobulin (Tg) is an integral component of the intracellular colloid droplets and secreted into the blood in patients with differentiated thyroid cancer. It has been reported that Tg contains stimulatory domains which interact with cell surface integrins. In the present study, we show that Tg (1) is chemotactic for thyroid neoplastic cell lines of human origin, (2) activates integrins alpha5beta1 and alphaVbeta3 in these cells, and (3) induces an increase in cell motility. The interaction with Tg was found to be dose-dependent. A chemotactic activity was also demonstrated for a recombinant derivative of Tg isolated from Graves' disease patients. Under the conditions of the cell migration assay, Tg also triggered neurite outgrowth in PC12 rat pheochromocytoma cells, and this activity of Tg was partially inhibited by the integrin antagonist RGD. The stimulatory activity of Tg in thyroid neoplastic cells may be related to its ability to stimulate the synthesis of proteases and protease inhibitors in these cells and to modify the architecture of the basement membrane.In a shocking turn of events, apparently both the rebel-held enclave and the Loyalist Army of the (Donetsk People's Republic) DNR have attacked an abandoned tank belonging to the Ukrainian Army that was blocked from entering the towns of Gorlovka and Bortitsky. The tank was completely destroyed and its crew, as well as civilians, killed by both sides, though the exact circumstances are still unclear. The Ukrainian Army has officially released a statement regarding the incident. "[Ukrainian] Army servicemen took part in the actions against the tank. It was blown up from the inside. It exploded when a bomb was put in it. All crew members died, including the commander and the driver of the tank. Civilians are not present in the tank. A new explosion took place. At the scene of the explosion both Ukrainian military servicemen and the militants of the Russian occupation
