A case study of an integrated program of STEM and language education. This article describes the authors' research, which examined the influence of the overall learning climate of an integrated program of STEM and language education. The program involved an exploration of the relationship between student learning and the impact of the culture of the institution and the chemistry classroom on a group of 41 students. Student learning was observed through classroom activities and student ratings of learning. The paper is divided into three parts. Part I describes the course sequence, instrumentation, and analyses of the data. Part II outlines the school and classroom learning climate of the school and chemistry course. Finally, Part III discusses the correlations between the school and classroom learning climate of the institution and the chemistry course and the findings of the students. The findings suggest that the teacher's classroom climate and overall learning climate of the school were not significantly correlated with students' progress in the course, which suggests that classroom culture does not influence student learning in the classroom.Over the past decade or so, I've given up trying to live on the dole and have actually built a small business in my spare time.
