Download Social Studies together with social science class 10 pdf downloadQ: Using `all()` to find out if all elements in an array are true (or False) Is there a way to use all() to find out if all elements in an array are true (or false) using pure Python? For example: def my_function(x): if (not all([x == y for y in x])) : return True else: return False A: I do not see anything wrong with @Divakar's function, but I came up with something a little different, which (I believe) is better in terms of readability. It uses a generator comprehension to represent each element, and checks the all() condition for all of those elements (by using break to prevent the generator from yielding the final value). I believe the generator function is more readable than the explicit list comprehension in @Divakar's function: >>> def my_function(x): if not all([x == y for y in x]): return True else: return False >>> my 2d92ce491b
