Words that are used to describe the state of a person, place or thing when the normal condition is in a state of distress, danger, or to come to an end, after which the situation is no longer normal or ordinary. For example, post-traumatic stress disorder describes the condition of a person when they have experienced an extreme event such as being in an airplane crash, seen the deaths of loved ones, or the sudden loss of a job, etc. Another example of the use of the word is that since an earthquake has struck Los Angeles, the fear of earthquakes is now the norm. You may have noticed that there are many business owners in the United States that now advertise or sell products and services to help people deal with the fear of earthquakes. For example, there are companies that sell earthquake equipment, and the California Department of Public Health is now offering free earthquake safety lessons. You can also take a look at the use of post- as a prefix with the word communist. Although some people now view communism as the obvious thing to believe in, when I was growing up and was introduced to the word, it was viewed as a very negative word. This is because Communism is associated with Russia, and people thought of Russia as a very violent and ruthless country that always wanted to invade other countries. Because of this, it seemed that someone who identified themselves as a communist was acting violently or in a manner that was thought of as being aggressive. In many respects, the word post- is like the word no- where you can say things have changed and no longer mean the same as they did before. I just saw this cool graffiti in Gainesville, Florida.
