Leptin, a product of the obese (ob) gene, is a key regulator of body weight and energy homeostasis, inhibiting food intake and increasing energy expenditure. Although the ob gene and the ob receptor (OBR) are only expressed in adipocytes, leptin acts in peripheral tissues to inhibit insulin-stimulated glucose uptake. Chronic leptin treatment of ob/ob mice, which overproduce leptin, partially reverses obesity. Here, we report that leptin treatment increases whole-body insulin sensitivity and insulin-stimulated glucose transport in adipocytes of obese ob/ob mice. In addition, leptin treatment of the ob/ob mice increases glucose transport in epididymal, but not subcutaneous, adipocytes, and enhances insulin-stimulated glucose transport in subcutaneous adipocytes. Chronic leptin treatment of ob/ob mice increases phosphorylation of serine 307 of IRS-1, resulting in increased phosphorylation of the insulin receptor and increased p85alpha subunit association with the insulin receptor. This is the first report of insulin-stimulated glucose transport in peripheral tissues of obese ob/ob mice that have been chronically treated with leptin. These results demonstrate that leptin treatment stimulates glucose transport in adipocytes of ob/ob mice.WASHINGTON - A federal appeals court on Tuesday freed a Pennsylvania man who was convicted on federal drug charges but never showed up for a hearing that ultimately led to his arrest and extradition from Spain.
