Optical character recognition (OCR) is the software or device that converts data from a scanned image or data file to a more legible computer-readable form. A lot of information from printed text is created and organized by hand and in a way that computers can manage, and print. OCR creates the ability to create computer files from scanned text. Wikipedia describes this as follows: "In computing, Optical Character Recognition (OCR) is an automatic procedure that converts images of text into machine-recognizable form, such as digital text, for use in a word processor, computer or other device. The text may be scanned from a printed page, a digital camera photograph, an image transmitted via email or any other source. If a library is to be controlled from a computer or a client-server system, the local client can use text entry forms for interacting with the library. 'Texts from Images', the mnemonic name for 'OCR' refers to the fact that text that appears in an image is extracted and converted into a form that computer can use." As the name implies, IRI is designed to work on images. The application can be used to create high quality images from bitmap graphics, transparent or watermark graphics, and structured or unstructured files (both JPEG and TIFF files). Users can also combine several files into one image. If you are using a scanner or camera and want to scan documents or photographs, you will be glad to know that IR3 supports several scanners and devices, such as Canon, HP, Epson, IBM, Kodak, Samsung, HP Indigo, Xerox, Panasonic, Abbingdon, FUJIFILM and others. Many image processing functions are provided to process and modify the scanned images.The functions include: converting to grayscale, black and white, sepia and inverted colors, extracting text from images, converting to JPEG, 09e8f5149f
