In June 1993, the "Packtoys" line were first released in the U.K. by Action Figure Direct, including a three-pack of figures from the TV series The A-Team, re-released in Germany as "Team America" in the late 1990s. The A-Team figures were re-released in both color and black-and-white in the early 2000s.[1][3] The "Attack of the Megas" line are toy figures of characters from Attack of the Killer Robots. This line was re-released by Hasbro in the late 1990s as "Attack of the Killer-Robots". These figures are action figures that would be on a mobile that would launch an alien from a robotic dog. The various toylines of the line (such as "Wonder Dog", "The Mech") incorporate a small robot into their toy packaging. Japanese toy and anime toy lines Toy companies in Japan also release toy lines designed for children (toy line for girls, toy line for boys, toy line for toddlers, and toys line for children). Some toy companies bring toys and related media, and promotions are often associated with that as well. Decades ago, many toy companies had their own television and radio commercial shows. Some companies even had their own TV and radio channels. Japanese toy lines are usually tied to a particular movie or television show. Much like Western toy lines, a Japanese toy line based on a television show or movie is often based around the characters of the show. However, some toy lines also use popular and/or expensive toy lines that, to a consumer, would be very desirable in its own right. Unpopular characters are sometimes transferred from its original source material in order to make the line have more consumer appeal, although it is not as popular as it would be with the original characters, it may have a much larger following than the original toy line did. Anime toy lines Anime lines are based on anime. Japanese animation, such as Dragonball Z, Sailor Moon, Pokémon, Digimon, as well as many other anime titles. The first anime-based toys were the Rockazooka toys that were launched by Bandai in 1981. These were a set of three rasp-y toys that could be combined to form a "Rockazooka", one of the more popular action figure and play-toy lines back then. Currently, there are
