Chemical and physical insults to the skin cause dramatic increases in the expression of the immediate early gene c-fos in subpopulations of neurons in the vicinity of the lesion. However, the underlying cellular mechanism has not been resolved. Here we show that in neurons adjacent to a punch lesion, the c-fos gene is activated at a later stage of the injury response compared with c-fos activation in neurons associated with the lesion itself. The induction of c-fos expression in the later, subpopulation of neuronal nuclei is not related to NOS1 expression. Rather, c-fos induction occurs in the absence of NOS1 expression and appears to be a consequence of increased expression of neuronal NOS in neurons located up to several millimeters from the injury site. We suggest that activation of neuronal NOS, an enzyme that produces nitric oxide to cause vasodilation, is essential to allow full expression of the c-fos gene.ADDIS ABABA (Reuters) - Three opposition candidates have withdrawn from Ethiopia
