The ability of cattle to produce an immune response to inactivated foot-and-mouth disease virus (FMDV) when challenged with antigen is important in the design of vaccination strategies. Field and laboratory studies were therefore undertaken in Europe to evaluate the safety and immune response of cattle to inactivated virus following vaccination, challenge and revaccination. Three European laboratories administered the modified-live vaccine candidate, C-strain/4C, to cattle and monitored clinical signs following challenge with the homologous virus. Vaccinated animals were revaccinated with C-strain/4C 4 weeks after the challenge. No vaccine efficacy was found in field studies, with the exception of minor clinical signs in a small percentage of animals after challenge. In laboratory studies, there were no clinical signs in vaccinated or control animals after challenge, with or without revaccination. Antibody responses to the FMDV vaccine after challenge were reduced when the revaccination was carried out. Vaccination and challenge with the virus produced severe clinical signs in cattle in the first field study, whereas in the second field study, although all animals exhibited clinical signs, only one of the three controls lost detectable levels of virus. All three laboratories in the field studies presented similar findings, with the greatest degree of clinical sign being seen in the first study. Due to the lack of efficacy in the first field study, the vaccine was withdrawn from European markets. However, in the second field study, the modified-live vaccine C-strain/4C was licensed in Japan. the district court denied his request to permit him to substitute an alternate jury under Rule 24(c). In addition to suggesting that Veney's death of recent years had increased his chances of receiving a death sentence (thereby justifying
