NEWARK, N.J. -- According to an official with the New Jersey Devils, they are very, very concerned about whether they will have a star defenseman to play for them next season. Defenseman Andy Greene is not under contract with the Devils, but he has become a potential trade chip for the team. And the Devils are hoping for a deal to be completed before training camp begins next month. While the Devils were expected to be busy this summer, with players with expiring contracts -- like Greene, for example -- available to sign, they have not made any new signings since re-signing star center Jaromir Jagr last week. So is a defenseman one of the targets of their free-agent strategy? Or is this a situation where the Devils will wait until after the NHL Draft in early June to see if any restricted free agents might be available? The Devils have more than $35 million in cap space, but the salary cap has increased to more than $71 million per year. And general manager Ray Shero has some decisions to make about which restricted free agents to sign or let go. The Devils have no obligation to sign any of their restricted free agents. For instance, Travis Zajac has a $5 million cap hit, but the Devils have to give up $1 million to sign him. They will still have about $28 million in cap space. But the Devils would like to have their restricted free agents signed by June 15, the opening of training camp. And if the Devils want to sign Greene to a long-term contract, he will be at a much higher salary than his current contract ($525,000 this year) to make it happen. At 31, Greene would certainly be an attractive option for a team in need of a No. 1 defenseman. He played in all 82 games for the first time in his career last season and had 12 goals and 44 points. Greene signed a six-year contract with the Devils worth $21 million in July 2010, and played for the Devils in the NHL Playoffs for the first time in his career.
