See MoreQ: Coordinates of two points on an ellipse Consider the ellipse $\frac{x^2}{a^2}+\frac{y^2}{b^2}=1$ where a and b are positive constants. From the ellipse, we can generate 2 coordinates for the points $SP_1(t_1,0)$ and $SP_2(t_2,0)$: $St_1 = \frac{b^2}{\sqrt{a^2+b^2}} \coth(\frac{\sqrt{a^2+b^2}}{a}-b)$ $St_2 = \frac{b^2}{\sqrt{a^2+b^2}} \cot(\frac{\sqrt{a^2+b^2}}{a}-b)$ Is there a way of calculating the coordinates of the points SP_{-1S} and SP_{-2S} in closed form? This approach didn't work for me. Thanks for any help! A: I suggest the following approach: if a and b are fixed and $S\frac{1}{a^2+b^2}$

Powered by NetGame In this article we will learn how to access a file directory in a LAN or WAN file server. In general you need administrator privileges to access file shares in a server, but if you are accessing the shares in a home-use server you may use some interesting tricks to access the shares without requiring administrator privileges. You may even be able to have some of the shared folders viewable only by a particular group of users so that some of the files and folders are not accessible by other users. You may also want to use various options and techniques to access your home-use file shares, such as allowing the users to connect without entering a password. Such a technique is known as guest-access. We will be using Vista, with an account running under a standard user, and with administrator privileges enabled. As we will see later, the following steps can be applied with success to XP servers as well. In this article we will discuss the requirements, advantages, and limitations of the Bluetooth technology. We will also explain how to get the Bluetooth drivers installed in Windows, and configure the wireless settings. First and foremost, as there have been a lot of questions about MSI Afterburner and afterburner 3 on Linux. I hope this post helps a few new people and answers a few old questions. The most common question I receive for the Afterburner software is how to install it in Linux. There are multiple methods for this. 1) You can grab the official MSI Afterburner 3 installer, which you can find here. Also, a zip of the installer is available here. You can then extract the zip to your desktop and double click on the 'install.sh' file to install the MSI installer into your Linux system. 2) You can also download the MSI installer via the MSI release download page, which you can find here. Right click on the MSI download and choose "Show archive location" or "Open with WinRAR". Once WinRAR is open, right click on "install.sh" and "extract here" or "extract here to" where you want to install the MSI installer. 3) An easier way to do this, and as recommended by the developer of the MSI installer is through MSI's alternate installer. Download that file, which you can find here. Then you can double click on the 'installer.run' file and the MSI installer should install properly. Now that you have an MSI installer of Afterburner installed in your Linux system, you can open the application from your dash, or command line. 1) In the dash, look for Applications > Graphics > MSI Afterburner3 2) In the command line, use the'sudo./afterburner3' command to launch the program 3) If you have more than one screen setup and the program is not seen in
