All JavaScript functions have a one-argument form: function foo() {... } In particular, all the built-in functions have this form, e.g. alert, document.getElementById, etc. However, some methods require multiple arguments, for example: var foo = document.getElementById('foo'); foo.onChange = function(e) {... }; Does anyone know why this is the case? A: When a function is named foo, the one argument function is named foo() But when a function is named foo(argument), the multiple argument function is named foo(argument). So an argument can be named, but not named argument, and then someone needs to tell you that. Writer and speaker Menu Tag Archives: #Nannying In a recent week of weeks, I've been having trouble leaving my house. I know. I could have taken the kids to the park or the pool or the library or the playground. After all, there was just so much outside. But the weather was maddening. It was either a cool, icy rain or a muggy, smoggy rain. It was constantly drizzling. Eventually, I got fed up with looking outside, so I made the decision to put the kids on the train and spend the day inside with them. I say this as a teacher. You know how I was taught to teach? My first teacher taught me to create comfortable learning environments. When I arrived on her classroom floor, she gave me a place to sit on a

As the Premier League's new media rights commissioner, Richard Scudamore, explained at the signing of the new TV contracts, the combined fees amount to an astonishing £1.8bn over five years. In part, these fees are repayments for previous loans, but the Premier League is essentially selling an income stream. A more accurate estimate of the new cash to be earned is £2.6bn in five years. Should it win the Premier League title, Manchester United will be receiving £44m in TV money. Should Liverpool win the league, then the figure is expected to be £45m. For Tottenham, it is a remarkable sum for a team that missed out on the Champions League under the old television contract when it finished four points behind Liverpool.
