You will learn basic tools and techniques such as moving, grouping, and cropping.Mystery-shop A mystery shop is a method of customer satisfaction whereby an employee under the direction of the owner or manager becomes a customer of a business to document quality problems. The employee is thoroughly briefed on the nature of the shop and its requirements, and is given the company's customer satisfaction rating. There are two variations: Mystery shopping, in which a customer is chosen at random and given a product; the mystery shopper then reports his findings to a supervisor or manager. Customer satisfaction survey, in which a team of employees approach a predetermined set of customers who are selected at random. The employees document their findings in a report. Criticism The phrase "Mystery shopping" has been criticized in some corners as being only a euphemism for hidden surveillance. There is a tendency to transform the customer into an experiment rather than an individual and to put the onus of explaining the problems on the customer. Some jurisdictions prohibit shopping of the type in which there is a genuine customer, and some companies restrict the practice of mysterious shopping to avoid a reputation for unfair treatment of their customers. alizationInclusion(JsonInclude.Include.ALWAYS); 1. Field of the Invention The present invention relates to a curable composition for resist pattern formation used in microfabrication of semiconductors. 2. Description of the Related Art The current trend in the manufacture of semiconductor devices is toward increasing the integration density of the integrated circuit, thus increasing the size of the chip area per integrated circuit. Such size increase places increasing demands on the technology required for printing fine patterns, particularly fine lines on a substrate, in order to manufacture semiconductor integrated circuits. In lithography for the manufacture of integrated circuits, a number of steps are involved. A semiconductor wafer undergoes coating with a resist, exposure, and development. The exposed semiconductor wafer undergoes a heat treatment (post exposure bake) after exposure, and then undergoes developing and etching. This process of coating, exposure, heating, developing, and etching is called a developing process. In recent years, as the design rule is made finer, the light source used for exposure becomes shorter in wavelength. The g-ray (436 nm) has been used as the light source. In the near future, KrF excimer lasers (248 nm) will be used as the light source. With finer design rules and shorter wavelengths of light sources, high resolution is required for resists. Use of a chemical amplification resist which shows high sensitivity, high resolution, and favorable dry etching resistance has been studied. As the alkali developer usable for a chemically amplified resist, aqueous alkali solutions are primarily used. However, the chemically amplified resist requires high resolution and high sensitivity. In particular, exposure light to which the resist is to be exposed is increasingly short in wavelength. In addition to enhancement in the resolution, development in a dry condition has been also studied. It is desirable that the chemically amplified resist shows shortening of the dry etching time in order to cope with the size increase of the
