We propose that such a layer could develop in the mantle under isotropic stress conditions. We further predict that a crater center could develop with this topography, due to the presence of a more dilute layer. We also find that the moon has likely been in an isochronal state for at least $\sim$150Myr. While the pure-liquid-layer model is unable to explain the lunar mantle structure of the moon, it does predict a thin layer of excess Ca in the upper mantle. These small amounts of excess Ca would be most easily detected in alunite fractionation experiments. However, the model would not predict alunite fractionation anomalies to occur in the lunar craters, consistent with alunite fractionation measurements in lunar craters of [@lunafrac]. The model predicts that the lunar mantle will fractionate alunite to a greater degree than the lunar core. This is further supported by a model calculation performed for a 2-phase pure melt (60km diameter) mantle, which predicted a small isotropic pressure gradient in the mantle. Here, the isotropic pressure gradient leads to alunite fractionating with respect to Ca, the composition of the majority of the lunar core, and not with respect to Hf, as assumed in the [@lunagif] model. A similar calculation performed with different compositions (pure ice in the lower mantle, pure magma in the upper mantle) predicted greater fractionation between Ca and lunar core materials than that seen in the [@lunaglf] model, specifically that the upper mantle would fractionate toward lunar core materials. Further tests of our model would
