A few patients with hematologic malignancies have developed disseminated mycobacterial disease after receiving mycobacterium-contaminated platelet transfusions. We describe four cases of disseminated mycobacterial disease occurring after receiving platelet transfusions contaminated with M. haemophilum. Most cases developed 2 to 8 years after infection, and all patients responded to antituberculous therapy. These cases indicate that platelet transfusion should be considered as a possible source of nosocomial infection, even after the introduction of leukoreduced platelet transfusions.
