What is motion capture data collection? It is a process in which cameras are used to capture 3D information about a person's movements in real time. Players wearing a motion capture suit with reflective markers are recorded with strategically placed cameras. This data is later used to accurately recreate a player's movements in the game. How can this help FIFA gameplay? New "bouncers" have been developed for use in EA Sports' FIFA franchise, and the gameplay has been updated to account for player speed and the way they perform certain movements, such as heading, making them more realistic. Additionally, FIFA's ball physics technology has been further refined, taking into account the collection of player movements, ball acceleration and rotation data. Will the rules be affected? No. Rules are the same as in real life, and the mechanics of the sport have remained the same. No players have been left out of the game and no game modes have been altered to improve its authenticity. Players will still play the same game. The player movement and ball physics have been adjusted to improve realism. In accordance with the laws of physics, players will perform more controlled, controlled movements than in real life; instead of jumping over a player, as is possible in real life, the player may perform a controlled move, or ball spin might be more erratic and unpredictable. Note: It is important to understand that many of the features of this new player movement are not in their final form and may change based on the player feedback from the beta. Is it just a change to the game? Is FIFA becoming more realistic? No. The game, gameplay and rules remain the same. Player movement, ball physics, and gameplay mechanics are more realistically enhanced than in previous iterations. How does the new player movement system work? There is no difference between the new player movement system and the current player movement system. It is just that the new system uses the real-life movement data collected from 22 players. FIFA 22 will be available worldwide on the PlayStation®4, PlayStation®3, Xbox One and PC on March 22nd. Xbox One gamers can also take advantage of Play For Free weekend to experience FIFA Ultimate Team™ on Xbox One.
