The Fan The Big Bad is gone, but the nightmares of life under the control of his alter ego can still haunt him. Did something go wrong along the way? On the fifth season of Arrow, Stephen Amell will make his return as Roy Harper, aka Arsenal. What started as an absurd super hero origin story with a fascinating array of supporting characters has become one of TV's most enduring and successful stories. How did we get here? Back in 2012, Amell made the big shift from playing Oliver Queen's two most important partners to a new alias on the CW's The Flash, the Oliver of earth 2. Amell's character the Green Arrow became a breakout character which almost single handedly took the character of the Flash, Barry Allen, to the mainstream audience. Since that time, Amell has had a successful run in the comics and his portrayal has taken him as far as the movie world. Breaking Arrow After the events of Arrow's fourth season, Oliver Queen returned to Canada's Star City to deal with the demons from his past. He left his "family" in Star City in order to try and find redemption and some semblance of a normal life for himself. He returned to Star City in the wake of the "Vigilante" arc of The Flash. This is where things began to take a turn that would culminate in the character's permanent banishment from the team. The death of his family and his continued abuse of his late wife Sara (Caitly Lotz) understandably left him at a loss of how to deal with his new life as a vigilante who was also the leader of a team of vigilantes in Star City. Before he knew it, Amell was facing off against his own team on multiple occasions and the writers, along with his company at the time, CBS, had painted him in a corner with no way out. It was a mistake. After the events of Arrow's fourth season, Oliver Queen returned to Canada's Star City to deal with the demons from his past. There were also technological advancements available to those who were interested. Like radio, television, and cell phones, this new technology allowed for the development of interactive devices used to access software and websites. Toys and games were also two of the most successful types of software produced during this time. Unfortunately, there was still very little in the way of home shopping software or virtual items at this time. The only retail stores were either independent businesses or larger department stores like Woolworths. Considering that most people bought their groceries from the stores rather than making their own shopping trips, the only people who had the opportunity to purchase these items were those with the resources to visit the department stores. Software developers had the potential to give their users an electronic version of the "online shopping mall" that was common in the 1990s. These mall-like websites could be used to download music, movies, and software, and also provide virtual presents. An example of this type of software was the shopping website Game Empire. In the late 1990s and early 2000s, people often spent more time on-line than interacting with their friends and family, hence there was an increased interest in on-line chat rooms. People were invited to share their thoughts and experiences through these chat rooms. While the websites or software were free to use, the owners of the websites received royalties from companies that featured their software, and it was not unusual for a user to spend hundreds of dollars on one of the online chat rooms.
