This question is inspired by Joseph Zito's article, "Breaking the Grid". I imagine an answer to this question would involve a limitation on the number of columns in a floor plan. If the maximum number of columns is three, and all columns have the same width, then the largest possible floor plan will have 12 columns. Here's a diagram of a 3x3 floor plan without restrictions on cost [ ][ ][ ] [ ][ ][ ] [ ][ ][ ] Where [ ] represents columns and x a material footprint. So in order to increase the available floor area by one column you must increase the footprint by 2-1/2 columns. The area of a square tile is 2 square ft. In order to maximize the ratio of area to cost, a planogram would have to maximize the ratio of area to the number of columns. Is there any planogram with a specified number of columns, that optimizes for this ratio (assuming an overall constant cost)? A: The idea that you can think of a floor plan as a collection of rooms can be a useful idea to think about when you're designing in a way that minimizes the number of interruptions in the flow of the space. But planograms are designed to maximize the size of the floor space. Their function is to fill the available floor space efficiently, and they don't have to be optimized for the ratio of footprint to number of columns, though that is certainly achievable. Q: How to get an array of sub-documents values Let's say I have a document like this: { name: 'John Doe', friends: [{id: 1, name: 'Peter'}, {
