A zenith for image editing Many media outlets commonly use Photoshop to publish their photos, including the CNN website. Since most photo editors use Photoshop for its product design prowess, anyone who wants to publish a website or blog will likely use Adobe Photoshop. The program was originally created by John Knoll of Macromedia and developed by him and fellow Macromedia employee Bill Wince, for Macromedia's proprietary Flash authoring platform. Adobe acquired Macromedia and later released this version of the product as Adobe ImageReady. What was common knowledge to digital artists is now known to technology enthusiasts as the Infamous Bill Gates "Photoshop bug." A bug is a problem, or defect. Engineers discovered that if you resize a portion of a window while resizing, then paste the resized image into another window, the original image will appear outside the window, pasted on top of other images. This bug was found and eventually patched. According to various websites, Photoshop was released in early 1991, when it was known as Adobe PhotoDraw. Adobe Photoshop CS2, an upgrade to the Adobe Photoshop Collection, was released in February 2004. Adobe Photoshop is not the only way to manipulate images, nor was it originally used for that purpose. However, it is the most popular image editor in the world by far. The name Photoshop soon came to be synonymous with all other image editors — and that is its power and its curse. To spread the power of this program, Adobe has made significant upgrades, such as Photoshop CS3. In the end, the choices of state and federal lawmakers remained tangled in knots. Federal judges found it unconstitutional for schools to take part. Educators and parents in Oregon staged mass walkouts. And a federal appeals court ruled that the law violated the Constitution. AD AD The two sides agreed to withhold significant money from school districts if they did not comply by June 30. By then, the Legislature had returned from its spring break and had not passed a budget, according to the secretary of the Oregon Education Association. If the budget is still unfunded by June 30, the only options left would be a federal court-ordered restoration of the programs or the state and federal governments suspending school funding, according to Chad Dickerson, an attorney who has represented parents in cases related to school funding. The Oregon Supreme Court ruled in June that a school funding lawsuit could go forward. At the time, education groups and the governor had vowed that the first item on the agenda for the session was school funding. The bill that passed was the one that put state money toward private school vouchers. When business leaders in the conservative Willamette Valley worked with the state GOP to craft legislation that would repeal the school funding lawsuits, they set up a $165 million fund that the state is ostensibly continuing to spend. "That was a big concern of mine, that those funding streams would dry up," said Keith Otteson, head of the conservative advocacy group New Oregon. "They have to be looking at both the litigation, as well as federal court orders to remain funding schools." AD AD Dickerson said he suspected that the governor and Republican legislators, at the urging of wealthy donors and Republican groups, would not allow the state to be forced to continue to pay out $400 million a year for its public schools. For now, however, the budget has been funded through June 30, making any final decision on education funding difficult to discern. Oregon is one of only two states where public schools are sued to force them to share their money with private schools, according to Otteson. He noted that other states with similar lawsuits did not fund their schools until the courts ruled in their favor. Oregon Democrats have been quick to note that the money needed to pay for the education program is in line with the highest spending in the country, which is $14,000 per student. The money, however, comes from the state, not

Enabling security features on WPA4 networks? - Mike_hn As time goes by, I'm trying to get my head around some of the security features in WPA4, and I don't seem to find any articles explaining things clearly, even on Wikipedia. The most confusing one being the need to disable Wake on LAN just to access the network. I can see it for home networks, but for a business environment, that seems absurd. Anyone know of a clear article about WPA4 security or can point me to some? ===== drapperfry Are you talking about 802.11w? See configuracion-... [lan](~~~ Mike_hn I think I am, but I can't be sure. I'm trying to understand WPA4 as I'm preparing to ask for a wireless switch for my office. ----- idoh If you are using a wireless AP that supports encryption features, then you should be able to ask it to set a self-generated certificate. The device will then use the certificate to authenticate the device which is connecting to it. If the device using the certificate is authenticated, then you will be authorized to connect. Wake on LAN should not be an issue since the new wifi capabilities will rely on what is called "Association Management". This removes the need to do any tricks with MAC addresses. Hi-tech diamond in the rough How can we learn all that we know? And how can we help future generations to learn it? A big part of this is virtual – the learning online, but there's a time and a place for classroom learning. And it's a big part of this week's #RetroMatter. I was introduced to virtual learning by way of UNISA via the International Centre for Agricultural Research in the Dry Areas (ICAR
