Field of the Invention The present invention relates to an illuminating or photographing apparatus and, more particularly, to an illuminating apparatus such as a silver halide camera and an autofocus camera that employs a phase difference detection system. 2. Related Background Art In recent years, many cameras employ a phase difference detection system that utilizes a light beam such as a CCD light beam to perform a focus detection of a lens from the variation of the degree of an image by projecting a light beam onto a focusing object and comparing the phase of the image of the light beam with that of a reference object. When an object is to be photographed, the phase difference between the reference object and the object is detected with respect to the focal plane of the photographing lens, and the position of the lens at the time of photographing is calculated on the basis of the phase difference. It is known that in such a phase difference detection system, the in-focus condition of the object can be detected by varying the time difference between a pair of light beams that are projected onto the object and the image of these light beams. As the speed of the variation of the time difference is raised, the in-focus condition can be detected with higher accuracy. Various methods have been proposed to increase the speed of the variation of the time difference between a pair of light beams. For example, as disclosed
