In recent years, an optical semiconductor device is proposed, which applies an electric field across the current injection direction of an optical semiconductor element and controls the light output from the optical semiconductor element by the applied voltage (see, for example, IP-A-2010-240698). JP-A-2010-240698 discloses a semiconductor light emitting device including: an anode electrode and a cathode electrode that are provided on an electrode support member so that a light output surface of a light emitting element is located in the direction of an electric field applied across the current injection direction of the light emitting element, and a light emitting semiconductor element is provided between the anode electrode and the cathode electrode. The light emitting device disclosed in IP-A-2010-240698, however, has a problem that, when the anode electrode and the cathode electrode are provided on the electrode support member, if the distance between the light emitting element and the electrode support member increases, the withstand voltage of the device decreases. Therefore, the light emitting device disclosed in JP-A-2010-240698 has a problem of the decrease in the electric field applied to the light emitting element, and the reduction in the light output from the light emitting element.
