The data you are dealing with is sensitive in a way that nobody should know about it. You may send an encrypted email but the recipient does not recognize the information that is meant to be confidential. Your business partner may send you an encrypted email but you are not sure whether the text you receive is decrypted or not. Many people have to deal with sensitive data in their daily life. Fortunately, none of this information is stored in plain text or can be easily decrypted. The details you just read about are in certain formats and protected by layers of encryption; this is the way this data is structured. There are various tools to encrypt data and programs to decrypt data. For example, encrypting business documents can be performed with any text editor. Whether you use an office suite, a simple text editor, or if you encrypt an email, there are many encryption tools available. Converting Data from Plain Text to Encrypted Text You have to get the data you want to convert from a plain text format to an encrypted text format. Once the data is encrypted it can be easily stored, shared, or transferred. Here is an example of how you could convert your email address from plain text to encrypted text. Using an Encryption Tool Let's assume you have an email address in plain text "information@email.com". With some encryption tools you can convert it to an encrypted email b7e8fdf5c8
