(One example is this question on the site. Another is this one on Area 51.) If we're going to suspend or close such a question, then we ought to do it fairly, fairly regularly, and consistently. Yet the more often such questions are closed as blatantly off-topic, then the more reviewers will just be irritated and discouraged, rather than convinced that there's actually some question here to be answered. What do you think? A: I think that once somebody sees the question, and we close it as blatantly off-topic, they'll think to themselves "Okay, I know that one's a no-go. I'll go back and edit my question so I cover all the bases". That's a lot of wasted time for our close-vote system. While there's some merit to the idea of auto-closing in these cases, I don't think it's
