nurses and bioethicists has issued a united response to NIH Director Dr. Francis Collins' comments about human embryonic stem cells (hESCs). In addition to Dr. Collins, numerous bioethicists, physicians, nurses and biomedical researchers have voiced strong objections to the NIH's latest funding proposal for hESC research, that would permit hESC researchers to use federal funds to access unfettered access to nearly every human embryo they can find. The coalition strongly disagrees with the NIH's view that it should be lawful to do what had previously been considered ethically unacceptable: destroy human embryos at any stage of development in order to obtain hESCs for research. The NIH's proposed policy is discriminatory and fails to respect the biological reality of human development. Although Congress has granted the NIH broad regulatory powers in the area of human embryonic research, the NIH's new policy inappropriately takes up the role of deciding where to draw the line on the availability of research resources. The new policy could allow researchers to access any number of human embryos, regardless of stage, and in circumstances that undermine the objectivity and integrity of the research. Discussions about the best use of these resources are better conducted outside of the hESC research space; and in fact, many of these discussions already have taken place in the research community. The Coalition for Human Stem Cell Research calls on all Members of Congress to oppose any attempts by the

Platou, Christy. (2003) 'Totalitarianism: A Very Short Introduction: A Very Long Struggle'. Apparatuses and methods consistent with the present invention relate to a method for displaying multimedia data in a portable terminal and a portable terminal using the method, and more particularly, to a method for displaying multimedia data using a display screen divided into a main region and a sub-region in a portable terminal, and a portable terminal using the method. With the development of mobile communication systems, the deployment of portable terminals such as mobile phones, personal digital assistant (PDA), or the like, has been rapidly spreading. The portable terminal allows users to transmit and receive information including text, video, music, and the like and to access the Internet. However, to use such portable terminals effectively, additional functions have been developed such as a function of email and a file download. Unlike the construction of desktop type personal computers, a display screen of the portable terminal tends to have a small display area in consideration of the size of the portable terminal, the changeability of the viewing condition, and the like. Also, a small display area of the portable terminal may cause inconvenience of selecting a menu option or the like. The screen division structure divides the screen into a main region and a sub-region according to the size and position of the screen, to optimize the portability of the portable terminal. However, as the screen is divided, the main region and the sub-region, the division of the screen has a problem in that user convenience is not considered. For example, when the user wants to download or receive content, the sub-region of the screen is occupied by a download icon or a receive icon, which is not useful for the user.
