SEOUL, South Korea — In the wake of the 2014 Winter Olympics opening ceremony in Sochi, Russia, South Korea began lobbying for South Korea's performance on the ice to be recognized in its Winter Games. But as it turned out, South Korea's resounding success in curling was overshadowed by a scandal involving an organized crime group that was deeply involved in the games' financial and promotional efforts. The shadow of that scandal still hangs over South Korea's joint-hosting of the 2018 Winter Olympics in Pyeongchang. Defending a team of young athletes in the Korean Ice Hockey League is the easiest way for the country to hype its return to the Olympics. But in the wake of the controversy over the 2014 games, South Korean officials have long worried about the bookend effect of the recent Olympics. Hopes for a long-awaited gold medal, as well as promises to improve facilities and education, are hardly the only reasons that South Korea is reluctant to share its Olympic moxie. The country has been on the defensive over its history of forcing North Korea to the negotiating table over the issue of its nuclear weapons and the failure of past Olympics to be a platform for unified Korean athletes. South Korea's preference is to be seen as unique and not to be linked to North Korea — and the country's reaction to the performance of the North's younger generation of curlers is a vivid example of how that push is backfiring.
