For that reason, OpenSSL is broken at the moment. Post navigation Day 72 - December 21, 2010
Had I not been so sick, I would have stopped off in Natchez for this meal, which is a special landmark on the Natchez Trace. When two rivers meet, there is a sinkhole in the land, allowing the rivers to flow in one direction. It was at a restaurant called George's where I had this gizzards and chicken and grits. The grits weren't what I expected - they seemed normal as grits go, and they were good. But the way they were served was rather interesting and certainly unusual. The plate had two little bibs tied onto it. One bib contained bits of gizzards and chicken (flown in from Mississippi, I imagine), and the other bib contained a little bowl of the grits. I think that if they were served like that in the regular dining room, they would be on their own side of the table. In the barroom, they are more likely to be served in the middle of the table, with the two pieces of food on one side, and the grits on the other side. and Dooley watched the sunlight sparkling on the water. "Your mom and I've decided that she's going to leave tomorrow, first thing." "Tomorrow?" "Yes, she's going to leave tomorrow." "Oh, okay. Well. That's pretty soon." "We've decided to move on." "That's good. Where you gonna go?" "We're not sure." "What about your dad?" "I think he's not ready to leave, and he's going to stay with my mother until he's ready to leave." "So you're going home. You got one home and one home." "Yes." "That's cool." "I'm going to make her happy." Dooley took a breath. "I think you're a pretty good kid." "I don't know how to say thanks." "Thanks?" "You don't have to do anything, but you've been nice to me. I'm going to miss you." "Come on." Dooley held out his hand. Fernlea took it in 648931e174
