In order to keep up with the high costs, people are looking for savings on their monthly payment plan. Recreation manager for Pleasant Hill Recreational Center, Dane Fuquay, said staff make plans for future growth by keeping an eye on the economy. "We work really hard to make sure we're always offering our customers a great membership price." Membership fees are generally calculated at 3 percent of an individual's gross income. This year, Pleasant Hill Recreation Center is accepting the first year as a "drawback" for either members or non-members. To qualify for this "drawback" non-members must sign up for a membership for six months and then sign up again for another six months, or they must maintain their membership for two years. "It's a good way for us to grow," Fuquay said. While Fuquay said the thought of losing a monthly fee may have crossed customers' minds, he said it's good for the community. "It helps spread our money around," he said. Buying a new apartment? Fuquay said it can be difficult to determine what a new apartment fee should be. "We like to be the cheapest," he said. Buying a house? Fuquay said it's also a common question for Pleasant Hill Recreation Center. "We have a bunch of (homeowners) meeting once a month and they help each other calculate what home fees are," he said. Fremont resident Kari Klaas was a member at Pleasant Hill Recreation Center's boys hockey team. Klaas said the center's

It works! FREE! Bibcam CamÂ .Q: Is there a way to define a new glib/gobject type? I'm using gpointer as a generic type to process various objects. This means that when I have a new object, it is common for me to cast that pointer to gpointer. Obviously gpointer should be a generic type. I would like to have the ability to define my own type and treat all pointers to that type as generic pointers, in which case I could use the same functionality that I have now. I am using gpointer in a number of places where I don't want to use the actual type which is assigned to the object. Is this possible or would I need to fall back on something like this: typedef struct _X { gpointer object; } X; With this approach, I could use the X and all elements of it would be correctly aligned. It seems to me that this approach is problematic as the same object can then cast away const or any other attributes I might have set on X. I really want to be able to do this: const X *x = malloc(sizeof(X)); But with my type definition. A: I'm no longer using this pattern. Instead I'm just using the generic pointer approach that you suggested. The Fmoc strategy--a widely applicable approach to the synthesis of peptides. The Fmoc strategy is an important enabling technology for the synthesis of peptides. It is a chemistry that has been used for a number of years to define short sequences on a solid phase. Fmoc is also valuable because it enables the synthesis of peptides containing very unusual side chains. The Fmoc strategy can be applied to numerous solid phase synthesis conditions, from manual to automatic machines. I compare the Fmoc strategy with other strategies and review its historical background and the various phases in its development. More recently, new Fmoc derivatives have been designed that are important for the creation of new peptide chemistries. These derivatives are introduced with a discussion of their general characteristics, and their potential and utility is discussed. Steadfast and true to the bible's call, the Church shall be a building made of diverse peoples. With faith and unity, we are all members of a single family.
