Andrew Cuomo wants to install metal detectors and other security devices to help thwart another terrorist attack. His proposal is one of a host of measures to beef up security in the wake of the 2015 suicide bombings that killed eight people and injured more than two dozen others. Cuomo on Friday proposed a series of safety changes to transit systems across the state, including at the city's 14 subway and bus depots. The measures would also add or improve bomb detection technology. "The safety and security of the state's mass transit system is one of our most important responsibilities, and I am proud of the work we have done to make New York's transit network one of the safest in the nation," the governor said in a statement. Cuomo said his proposal would "enhance security measures" at the city's subway and bus depots by installing more security technology and similar detectors to those already in use on the New York City Police Department's six police precincts that patrol subway stations. He also wants to add a system of metal detectors and bag searches at five state Department of Transportation-run transit hubs, two in New York City and three in the Syracuse area. The plans would be paid for with more money from the Metropolitan Transportation Authority. Cuomo and the MTA first discussed strengthening security at transit hubs in February. Meanwhile, an NYPD spokesman said police and transit officials worked out an agreement so officers would no longer go through with full police pat-downs at stations. But officials haven't said how they'd address new threats posed by boxcutters. Some security experts say the subway system is a soft target, because it's relatively small and there's few places to hide explosives. A spokesman for MTA officials said his agency is "an operator of a transit system, not a storage facility," but he also said they'd work with Cuomo to address security concerns. Experts say the answer is to beef up security measures within the buildings themselves. Benny Matas, a counterterrorism expert at the Wilson Center, said there aren't a lot of options, given the limitations of mass transit stations. "These are all

Gliomatosis cerebri Gliomatosis cerebri is a form of glioma which occurs with the brain. It is a rare disease caused by abnormally proliferating astrocytes, glial cells that provide support for neurons in the brain. The disease affects the whole brain and generally presents with headaches, seizures and altered mental state. Symptoms Gliomatosis cerebri is a rare form of glioma that affects the whole brain. It has been found to be a cause of headaches, seizures, and altered mental states. Causes The cause of gliomatosis cerebri has been associated with various chromosomes. The most common mutations are on the short arm of chromosome 7. The expression of gliomatosis cerebri has been found to be associated with younger patients between the ages of 15 and 38. The median age is 20. Diagnosis The diagnosis is based on neurological signs, the radiological features found on MRI, and the histological diagnosis of glioma. Perfusion imaging can show areas of hypoperfusion. In some cases the tumour will show increased CBF, indicating a non-enhancing component. Treatment Treatment is difficult and is often not effective. There is no consensus as to what should be done with the disease as different forms respond to different methods of treatment. Chemotherapy has been shown to be effective in some cases, however, the prognosis is poor with a median survival of 10 months. Surgery has been shown to benefit some patients however, surgery can cause significant neurological damage and is difficult in some cases. Prognosis Survival rates have been shown to improve with diagnosis at an earlier stage. Patients with symptomatic tumours have shorter survival rates than asymptomatic tumours. Epidemiology Gliomatosis cerebri is an extremely rare disease. It was first described by Dr. Banno T. in a case report. Patients were previously assumed to have multiple gliomas but were in fact diagnosed with gliomatosis cerebri. In the last 5 years, there have been 40 cases reported in the literature.
