Rebuilding, recovery & repurposing Steps from Africa Flying from Botswana to Jo'burg, I'd been picturing the African savanna of the Serengeti, a vast plain of meandering rivers, contorted, dry red-gravel hills, and a massive jagged rock of the same red sandstone. I'd been imagining walking on sand dunes covered in Queen of the Night lilies, crawling over a field of wildflowers, or even clambering over a million starfish shaped, 100-million-year-old fossils. I'd been keeping this notion locked in my mind for the past month when I finally arrived in Jo'burg. Exiting the airport, I was delighted to see this: The streets were lined with beige cement houses, mostly a few stories high. But this was to be expected in the suburbs of Jo'burg. Nothing like the view I had imagined. After a taxi ride through the center of the city, I pulled off the highway into a quiet suburban neighborhood. The streets were lined with beige cement houses, mostly a few stories high. But this was to be expected in the suburbs of Jo'burg. Nothing like the view I had imagined. But then, one of the houses caught my eye. It was noticeably larger than the others, and looked as if it belonged in the center of a city instead of a neighbourhood

Escape Motions Rebelle 3.1 Crack me and I'm going to never put myself in that position again. Just Kidding... OK, here are what I do. I make one copy and keep it in my wallet. My ID will have some sort of security. I wear a vest with a long under arm cavity in the back that gets constantly refilled with cash (one denomination). The rest of my cash is kept in my car in the trunk. When I need cash, I get out the actual cash and put it into my vest. When I have the time to count the cash, I do and put the difference into a jar on top of the front seat of my car. When I try to use my debit card and get a message that there is insufficient funds on my account, I say I am sorry. Then I get back to whatever I was doing. Guns don't kill people they are just an inconvenience. Keep your eyes open, but use them with caution. Unless you are in a situation that completely convinces you otherwise, that is not a tough thing to find out, if it was a LEO you would be charged with assault by any LEO. There is no fun in any of this, just a wild ride. I understand what you are saying, and if it came down to it, that is how I would probably act. But, the
