Development of a sensitive competitive ELISA for measurement of bacterial lipopolysaccharide in serum. Bacterial lipopolysaccharide (LPS) is known to be a potent stimulator of the immune system. Sepsis with resulting endotoxic shock is the most common cause of death in intensive care units. To evaluate severity of sepsis, current assays are often unable to detect serum LPS concentrations in the range observed in vivo. We recently established an ELISA procedure for the sensitive measurement of LPS in serum. We now describe a competition ELISA that can detect LPS concentrations as low as 0.5 ng/mL in a volume of plasma/buffer. The test principle is based on the competition between serum LPS and a fixed concentration of an LPS-specific antibody for binding to LPS-specific antibodies on the plastic surface of the microtiter plates. Standard curves were drawn

A 5-year study of psychological, social and physiological effects on adolescents during their first international tour of duty. The study of adolescents who have been deployed on military missions requires attention to the psychological, social and physical health effects experienced by these young people. Previous studies of US adolescent military and non-military samples have shown that they suffer few, if any, impacts, but are unaware that their peers experience serious psychological problems. International studies are needed to address this issue because adolescents in many countries are deployed on missions, some of which are unusual for young people. In a larger study, we examined the psychological, social and physiological effects on a group of Australian adolescents aged 13-16 years who were deployed on an international peacekeeping mission (n = 83) compared with a group of age-matched Australian adolescents not on a peacekeeping tour (n = 84). The adolescents were surveyed two days before being deployed, on the day of deployment and three weeks later. Psychosocial and physiological measures were compared at each time point. The results showed that the majority of adolescents experienced no harm from the deployment, while a significant minority (14%) showed substantial decrements in their personal adjustment. Psychological and social impacts were similar for boys and girls, although girls showed greater physiological reactions. Also, during the return from deployment, girls showed more psychological disturbances and anger than boys, but no physiological differences were found. The findings of this study and those from other international studies suggest that compared to adolescents not deployed, there is substantial need for support for these youth in the field.
