While therapy with thymoxamine during the reperfusion period after acute myocardial infarction results in less leukocyte infiltration and improved left ventricular function, we have recently demonstrated, that in the longer term post-infarction complications can occur, the mechanism of which remains obscure. The objective of the present study was to analyse the effect of thymoxamine treatment on leukocyte infiltration and function in rats subjected to acute myocardial infarction. Ischaemia/reperfusion, induced by coronary occlusion followed by reperfusion, resulted in massive haemorrhage, leukocyte infiltration and activation. Treatment with thymoxamine in doses of 0.3 mg/kg to 1.2 mg/kg during the reperfusion period, i.e. 4 h to 3 days after the infarction, significantly reduced the blood infarction area and leukocyte infiltration into the necrotic area. Leukocyte adhesion to the capillary endothelium, extravasation into the interstitial space and function (superoxide production and chemotaxis) were significantly reduced. It is concluded that thymoxamine treatment during the reperfusion period after acute myocardial infarction reduces leukocyte infiltration and activation.Q: ArcGIS Javascript: How to create an array for ArcGIS REST parameters?
