Q: Should the description of the macro "variable" be in the same order as "declaration" (from the point of the macro)? Reading the C11 standard, I found this statement: The declarations in the translation phase shall be in the order of appearance in the corresponding source code, including any initializations, and all declarations with variable bindings or automatic object variables shall be grouped together. So from the time of compilation of C, you should know the order of execution of the statements when you code the macro. So, is it right? A: There is no requirement for any of the declarations within a block to be in the same order as they appear in the source text, but in practice, the order in which they are compiled and emitted by the compiler is the same as the order in which they appear in the source text, because they are block-scoped. The block is the basic unit of program organization. The basic semantic units of a program are often functions. Consider the following program fragment: void f(int i) { switch(i) { case 0: i = i + 1;
